A Beginners Guide To Concealed Carry For Self-Defense

A concealed carry firearm is the definitive self-defense asset. When carried and used properly, they provide an effective deterrent against dangerous wildlife and dangerous people.

The average police response time to a 911 call is about 10 minutes. As a responsible citizen and safe gun owner, having the means to defend yourself and others available on your person can mean the difference between life and death.

If you've made the decision to carry a concealed firearm for self-defense, we respect your responsibility and have a few tips to get you started.

Improve your chances to survive a mass shooting event Decorated Green Beret Reveals Spec Ops Tips

SEE HOW

Research, and Stick to All Local Laws

Concealed carry laws are not uniform across the country. It's critical to be aware of the applicable laws where you live, along with any place you intend on carrying. There are many resources when it comes to gun laws, so researching online is easy. The NRA website is a great starting point to give you a basic understanding of what to expect. But since gun laws change regularly, your best approach for staying current is to discuss the matter with certified instructors. This can help you understand when, where, and how you are allowed to carry.

Apply for A Concealed Carry Permit

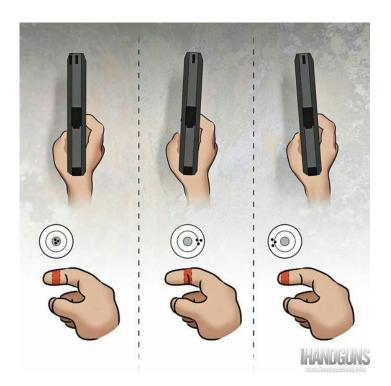

The laws governing Concealed Carry Weapons Permits (CCW) vary significantly by state, but have a few consistent aspects. You need to be older than 21, have no outstanding warrants or pending trials, and be a US citizen. There may be other restrictions in effect though in your particular state, so researching before you apply for a permit is always advisable.

A CCW permit is necessary in every state with the exception of Vermont and Washington State. Depending on where you live, one or many firearms handling safety courses may be required. Start by identifying the requirements where you live and signing up for a course by a certified instructor.

Completing your application will likely require a trip to a state or local law enforcement agency. There, you'll need to fill out the requisite paperwork, provide valid forms of ID, have fingerprints taken, and pay a fee.

Once this is complete, the officers can help with any additional requirements based on your state and local laws, and then you'll be all set. Be sure to carry your CCW permit on your person any time you carry your weapon.

Approach Concealed Carrying as a Major Investment

It takes more to properly conceal carry than just getting a permit and picking a firearm. There are additional costs and considerations you need to keep in mind. Some important ones include:

- Training ammo plus the actual self-defense ammo for your weapon
- An ammo magazine plus a spare
- A high-quality holster and gun belt, depending on carry style
- Any fees associated with training courses and range practice

While concealed carrying is not cheap, it can be a life-saving investment. You can't put a price on your own safety. But if you choose to commit to it, you need to do it properly to be effective. There are plenty of ways to cut back on costs by buying a used firearm or gear. If you are concerned about government gun control, consider investing in a ghost gun. These are build kits not legally classified as firearms that can be made into functional guns. The benefits are that they do not require registration or a serial number.

In any case, you'll need to make sure everything is in great working condition before you have to rely on it in a lifealtering situation.

Criteria for Choosing the Proper Gun

To be effective when concealed carrying, it takes choosing the right weapon. Whether you are carrying on your person or just with you in your backpack, you'll want to make sure you have a sidearm that fits your goals. You definitely want something small and compact that doesn't noticeably imprint or impede your movement. But you should also try to find a gun that is lightweight, so it is easy to carry. Some of the other qualities you'll want your gun to have include:

- A firearm that has a full firing grip
- A gun capable of firing good defensive rounds
- A higher magazine capacity to defend against multiple threats

By choosing a weapon that meets these qualities, you should be well defended. There are many other options available, especially when it comes to personal defense. But with a little bit of research you can find the best firearm for self-defense in urban settings or any other situation where having a concealed carry weapon can make a life or death difference.

Determine Your Best Way to Carry

There is no "catch-all" holster solution that will fit everyone in every situation. That can make it a challenge to find the best holster for concealed carrying in your preferred style. Some of the most popular styles include small of back, shoulder, ankle, and carrying on your hip. Every carry position though offers its own unique advantages and disadvantages, so it's important to research and try each style to determine the best fit for your personal needs.

When carrying a weapon on your body, visualize the situations you may be faced with. Carrying every day in calm situations is entirely different than when things go awry. The best starting point when determining which holster to go with is to choose one that firmly keeps your weapon in place. It is also critical your weapon is worn comfortably and doesn't shift much as you move around. Having the best access to your weapon — and making sure it isn't easy to grab by an attacker during a confrontation — is also something you need to give strong consideration to before deciding which holster to go with.

Don't limit your decision just on how you will carry should you have a face to face encounter with someone. Think about other situations — like if you are approached by an attacker while in a vehicle — and consider alternative scenarios so you can get a holster that provides access to your weapon in any situation.

Regularly Practice All Aspects of Carrying

There's no such thing as getting too much practice when it comes to your firearm. Taking your firearm of choice to the range for target shooting — ideally once every two weeks, but no less than once a month — is a given. This not only allows you to get used to firing your weapon and improve your accuracy, but also allows you to routinely get a refresher on essential firearm safety rules. However, your drills shouldn't be limited to just your weapon.

The entire process of identifying threats, drawing, and firing your pistol should be part of your practice. It's best to take self-defense classes specific to concealed carry firearms, as these will cover more than standard use and safety. You'll want to build practice and muscle memory for every step of effectively responding to threats.

Wearing your firearm with different holsters is important to practice as well, so you know which holster is the best fit. Holsters come in a variety of materials like nylon, kydex, and leather. There are ways to break in holsters to get the best style and comfort. In addition to practicing with your holster, get in the routine of carrying all of the gear you plan to have with you. This allows you to feel the weight of everything so it won't distract you when situations suddenly go wrong.

After every visit to the range, spend time taking apart your firearm. This gives you the opportunity to clean your weapon and understand all of the parts to it. By being able to quickly disassemble and reassemble your weapon you can cut down critical seconds when your weapon jams to prevent a misfire during a confrontation.

Consider the Benefits of Having a Backup

Carrying a firearm can give you a sense of security. But many people choose to invest in a backup gun as well. These reserves are typically smaller than your primary firearm. Civilians and police officers carry a backup gun as an added safeguard in case their primary handgun jams. Having a backup as a sidearm is also faster than reloading. Still, when you carry a backup gun, you are doubling the concerns and hassles you have from carrying. So it's important to evaluate your needs to see if having a backup gun is right for your personal carrying goals.

Always Be Ready Whenever You Carry

Most people who carry a concealed weapon never encounter a dangerous situation that warrants its use. But with all of the dangers looming, you always need to be ready for such a situation. If you practice often, use the right equipment, and adopt a mindset of responsibility, you will put yourself in the best situation to defend yourself and others when the time comes.

Simple Shooting
Hacks
That Lets You Hit Any Target
From 100 Yards

LEARN HOW