

E. Garner and M. Brown — What's Happening?

Right on the heels of the Grand Jury announcing that there would be no indictment of the police officer who killed Michael Brown in Ferguson, Missouri, we have another grand jury deciding that it would not indict a police officer for the killing of Eric Garner in New York. To many the two cases are almost the same, but there's a lot that's different about them.

What's the same is that in both cases a white police officer killed a young black man in the execution of their duty. In both cases, the respective Grand Juries decided that the police officers hadn't used excessive force; but had, in fact, followed the guidelines laid out by their police departments for the use of force in apprehending suspected criminals.

However, what's happening in the court of public opinion and the press, as compared to what has already happened in the Grand Juries, seems quite different. It seems that parts of the nation have already decided that both police officers are guilty of killing innocent young black men and that they should be tried and convicted of that.

We have to realize that in both cases, the facts of the case are immaterial to those who are trying it in the court of public opinion. They have already passed judgment that America's white police forces are out to kill black youth. It doesn't matter other things the police actually does, nor the fact that police actually kill more whites than blacks.

You never see those things being talked about by the mainstream media. So, what's really happening here? Why are people ignoring the facts and the decisions made by the two Grand Juries?

What's The Catch?

You might be wondering, as I've wondered, who can possibly benefit from such a war? That's a good question and one I'm not sure that any of us can really answer; but there are a few possibilities that I'd like to mention.

First of all, there are race baiters in our country who are working hard at raising racial tensions. And I see Barack Obama, Eric Holder, Al Sharpton, and Jessie Jackson among them. Those aren't the only ones, by far, but those are the ones who get the most press. While those four don't confide in me with their plans, their actions are easy to see and to read.

It seems rather clear that they, and others who work with them, are taking every act of racial violence and injustice against the black community that they can and using it to increase racial tension.

Widespread rioting and fighting would give President Obama the excuse that he needs in order to declare martial law. Once he did that, he could suspend the Constitution and pretty much do whatever he wants to with the country. There would be nobody with the authority to stop him.

Another, slightly less drastic possibility is that ongoing racial tension could justify the ongoing militarization of our police forces and federal government agencies.

The president has already named a commission to review police work here in the United States and has put one of his cronies in charge. It's not all that unrealistic to think that he's already told his buddy what sort of recommendations to make; that of federalizing all police, concentrating power in the president's hands.

There's also the possibility that riots and violence play into

Obama's plans to destroy the country. The more damage they can cause, the greater a strain it puts on the country overall. If enough damage is created in one area, the looters and rioters may move out into other areas, burning down more businesses and further damaging the economy of those communities.

Then there's the possibility that all of this is nothing more than a means for the aforementioned race baiters to enrich themselves, at the expense of the country. It's clear that Al Sharpton and Jesse Jackson are making money off of it. Even their own people have complained about it.

One thing is clear, the demonstrations and violence we're seeing today are being intentionally fueled by those who want that violence for their own agenda. For some reason, the mainstream media is part of the plan. Everything that can be done to inflame the situation is being done and nothing is being done to diffuse it. In fact, the people who should be working to diffuse it are some of the very ones who are working to increase it.

You can be sure that this violence isn't going to end soon. If another situation doesn't come along naturally to fuel the fire, one will be created. There have been too many people who have "conveniently died" on Obama's watch for anyone to call it coincidence. While I won't accuse him of ordering their deaths directly, I will accuse whoever is the puppet master that he answers to.

As I said, the violence isn't going to end. In fact, I'm fairly certain that it's going to increase. There's a very good chance that 2015 is going to be known as the year of the Second American Civil War. This one will be a race war and it will be just as cruel and bloody as the race baiters can make it.

Be ready when it comes, because the only one who can protect you... is you.
