

5 Things Kids Should Know If SHTF

Teaching kids about survival is a tough thing to do, mostly because it's often difficult for them to imagine that life as they've always known it can change in a blink.

Regardless, it's imperative that they know what to do because they will most certainly need to play an active role in your survival plan.

Whether it's defense, or simply taking care of their siblings and carrying their own bags, kids need to know what to do if SHTF.

Before we get into what your kids should know at a bare minimum, it's important that you have a serious talk with them about why you're preparing for an emergency. If they're old enough, point out current events that lead you to believe that your concerns are valid.

Discuss other events, such as wars or natural disasters, where average people were forced quickly into survival situations. They need to understand WHY, not just HOW to prep.

Basic Information

From the time your kids are 3 or so, they can begin to learn their basic information. This includes their full name, address, town, and phone number. They should also know your full name.

As they get older, teach them how to contact other family members or emergency contacts. Young kids also need to be taught basic "stranger danger" skills because if SHTF, they'll certainly need that knowledge.

Include them in your plans and in your practice sessions. Give them specific duties as they get older. This will be valuable in two ways: first, you're going to need all the help that you can get. Second, knowing what to do will help kids control their fears and will give them a sense of purpose.

Escape Routes

If your kids are young, draw maps of the house and yard and practice fire/emergency drills. Use different exits depending upon where they are in the house. Assign a safe place to meet up and make sure that they get there. Include that in your drills and try not to change the location!

If your kids are older, teach them how to get to designated meet-up spots from school and from various places such as the mall, ball practice, and other places where they may be if SHTF. Maps are great for this practice. Create a phone list that they carry in their backpack and impress upon them that their phones probably won't work in many emergency situations.

How to Build a Fire without Matches or a Lighter

This is one of the basic skills that Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts learn at an early age. In case SHTF, knowing how to start a fire is a skill that they can use in any number of situations.

If they're alone, they can use it to signal for help, or they can use it to keep warm or cook. If they're in a group, it's a skill that will help give them a sense of usefulness and purpose.

Get them their own fire kit for their bags when they're old enough.

Basic First Aid

First aid is a skill that kids can begin to learn at a very early age. Begin when they're young with simple skills such as applying a bandage or cleaning a boo-boo. As they get older and more capable, teach them more advanced skills including how to treat burns, cuts and fevers. Most fire stations or emergency squads teach first aid and CPR courses to community members. Enroll your kids when they're old enough to do so. These are valuable life skills for anyone to have.

Self-Defense

Even if you decide not to teach your kids to use weapons, it's still a good idea to teach them how to defend themselves.

If you opt to teach them to use weapons, be sure to train them thoroughly both in safety and in use.

Even if they know how to use weapons, self-defense classes are still a good idea. It's a great form of mental and physical exercise even if they never need to use it for its intended purpose.

These are just a few things that kids should know if SHTF.

This list is in no way inclusive but it's a place to start. Other valuable information that kids should have include:

- Their exact role in your emergency plan
- How to find/filter water
- What local plants are edible

- How to fish
- How to sharpen a knife
- How to use hand tools
- How to tie different knots

What you should teach them depends upon what you're preparing for. The most important thing is that you include your kids in your plan and encourage them to take an active role in drills and practices. Give them all of the information that you have as they get older so that should anything happen to you, they have the tools that they need to survive.

In the end, that's really all that you can do!

Choose your defense.
What if you're wrong?
